

WORK INCOME

Part of your work income is exempted when your benefit is calculated. For example, if you are an independent adult and are receiving social assistance, you are entitled to earn up to $200 per month without a reduction in your benefit.

However, any amount in excess of $200 will be deducted from your benefit. For instance, if you have work income of $250, your benefit will be reduced by $50.

The exemption also applies to the following income:

- maternity benefits, paternity benefits, parental benefits and adoption benefits
- compassionate care benefits paid under the Employment Insurance program

LIQUID ASSETS

A person who is receiving last-resort financial assistance can have a certain amount of liquid assets (based on his or her situation) without his or her benefit being affected. This is called a basic exemption and the amounts that apply in the various situations are set in the Regulation.

It also grants assistance to families whose adult members do not have a limited capacity for employment or families of which at least one adult member has a temporarily limited capacity for employment.

You have a temporarily limited capacity for employment if, for example, your health prevents you from engaging in a job preparation or integration activity for a period of at least one month. You must submit a medical report establishing such limitations to the Ministère du Travail, de l'Emploi et de la Solidarité sociale.

Note

Except in certain cases, the basic benefit granted under the Social Assistance Program to adults or families who live with one of their parents is reduced by $100 per month (by $50 per month in the case of the spouse of a student).

If you participate in an employment-assistance measure or a social assistance and support program, you could receive an employment-assistance allowance or a support allowance in addition to your benefit. However, you cannot receive a temporarily limited capacity allowance and an employment assistance allowance or a support allowance at the same time.
